Easy steps to moving your money (over)

If you decide to move your checking account to another bank or credit union, here's how to make the transition a little smoother:

- Open the new account first.
- List all automatic deposits and withdrawals scheduled each month on your old account, including bills such as utility bills or credit cards.
- If you have direct deposits, fill out the papers directing your employer to reroute your paychecks to your new account. Do the same for other direct deposits, such as Social Security payments.
- Once you find out the date of the first direct deposit on your new account, arrange for your automatic debits and withdrawals to be made from your new account and be sure to cancel them from your old account.
- To avoid fees, leave enough money on your old account to cover any checks that haven't cleared or automatic payments that haven't been made.
- Once you're certain all direct deposits and automatic payments are made on your new account, transfer the remaining funds and close the old account.
- Get written confirmation that the account has been closed.
- Don't forget to tell your bank why you moved your money!
